Thereafter, the notion came to mind to study the respective clans over a period of several generations. On the basis of the knowledge of these extended family members, we decided to undertake a complete enquiry of each and every family member over a limited number of generations. All three, Ritter, Vogel and Linger, were men of medicine and had the same tenet of racial hygiene internalized and accepted it as fact: the behaviour of a group of the periphery of society is based on by on the genes of its members and not the result of social relations.
